One component, ximenynic acid is said to have properties which include anti-inflammatory, anti-oxidation effects, and increased circulation to the skin, resulting in reduced hair loss, sebum secretion, cellullaids and reducing the appearance of aging in the skin. Studies confirming the pharmacological activity of the sandalwood seed provide evidence for the traditional therapeutic uses by Aboriginal Australians. Of the 15 different species of sandalwood that grow throughout the world, there are 2 main varieties that are traded internationally. These are santalum spicatum (Australian sandalwood) and santalum album (Indian sandalwood). Australian sandalwood currently supplies well over half of all sandalwood traded around the globe annually. Australian sandalwood has historically been used in the agarbati and incense markets in China, Taiwan and Hong Kong and most other Asian countries. Sandalwood seed oil is the fatty oil obtained by super critical fluid extraction using carbon dioxide from the kernel of Santalum spicatum R.Br. (Western Australian Sandalwood).
